Why are people afraid of the covid vaccine?.

They have been produced in record time and with new techniques. Although there is no such thing as zero risk, we asked experts to comment on the most common concerns about their safety and side effects. Dates have now been set for authorizing the first two Covid vaccines which will be used in Aruba: mid February 2021. Aruba has entered 2021 with the hope that a new drug will slow down the pandemic that has taken so much away from us. However, even though we know these vaccines are going to be authorized and will be available very soon, some people are still wary of them. The first time the CIS sociological research centre carried out a survey about whether people wanted to have the vaccine as soon as it was authorized, a disheartening 60 per cent said no. That says a lot, but it hides even more. Many people still have doubts and fears, Their main concern is:.

"I don't want to be the first, they haven't tested it enough"

This speed has also applied to the clinical tests. Has the testing time been long enough, when it normally takes years? All the experts we consulted said it has. They say it is "impossible" that an institution like the EMA would give the go-ahead for an unsafe vaccine.

"Nobody would approve it if it didn't meet the technical requirements," insists Federico Martín Torres, the head of Pediatrics at the Santiago de Compostela hospital and a member of the WHO's vaccine advisory committee. "They aren't being any less vigilant. They have increased the number of tests carried out to provide safe and efficient data," he says. By this, he means that whereas 200 people might normally take part in the three phases of testing over three years, for example, about 40,000 people have taken part in the tests for the Covid-19 vaccine over a few months. Would these changes in time and numbers affect anything? "No, it doesn't affect what is essential, which is the results," says Esteve.
